

But Dr. Smith said he was "well satisfied" with the honesty and informality of the interviews.

As an example of "one splendidly successful volunteer," Dr. Smith described one young man who failed to impress anyone at Berkeley.

"He was quiet, a loner, not interested in girls and socially awkward. But he got to Ghana and discovered he had a vocation for teaching," the psychologist noted.

"The experience even carried over," Dr. Smith added. "He's now working in a special field of education here and is very effective. What we had missed was his readiness for commitment. It doesn't matter that he isn't hail fellow well met."
