

Then by talking with the people who recruited them you can get a picture of the tremendous change that has been made, change most usually in attitudes, capabilities for getting along with other people, and so on.

Chairman PERKINS. The training that has taken place in the Job Corps camps at the present time—do you feel it is more suitable than if you were to try to train that same youngster right in the vocational schools or in a residential center?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir, I certainly do. I think he has to have intensive type of approach made to the problems that he faces, where vocational schools are not geared to do that kind of intensive training.

Chairman PERKINS. And we have no residential centers in Kentucky presently to do that type of training?

Mr. DAWSON. Vocational schools are just not geared to do that. They can have a counseling service but not the intensive kind. They do not have people who are capable of reaching some of these boys who need to be reached.

Chairman PERKINS. What was the figure that you used in your evaluation study of the Job Corps people?

Mr. DAWSON. We surveyed a group of about 712.

Chairman PERKINS. If I understood your survey, you had about a 50-percent placement and left of course a 50-percent nonplacement, but considering the nonplacement, using your figures, however, only 56 out of that 356 or 50 percent, I believe you said, were definitely not placed and the rest you simply did not know about so only 14 percent of that nonplacement group was definitely unemployed according to your study. Is that correct? That is according to your study.

Mr. DAWSON. The figures that you have, Mr. Chairman, are just a little bit wrong. Of the 355 that we had we have the 177 that did not respond.

Chairman PERKINS. Those are people that you did not know about and you do not know whether they are employed or unemployed.

Mr. DAWSON. That is right, we do not know what happened to them. Then we have an additional 31.

Chairman PERKINS. And an additional 91 that are unknown that could be employed?

Mr. DAWSON. That is right.

Chairman PERKINS. And only 50 percent that you do not know about?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman PERKINS. Let me compliment you for an outstanding statement. I am delighted you have come up here to help us. You have been most helpful. I will now call on Congressman Quie at this time.

Mr. QUIE. On the survey that you made down there, which I guess you mentioned in the last part of your statement, Mr. Dawson, do I understand that you made the complete survey available for the record?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. QUIE. How are you informed by the Job Corps that a particular individual has completed training and is available for followthrough?

Mr. DAWSON. This has generally been handled by a series of reports that come through the regional Department of Labor office.

Congressman, I could not answer you exactly on the form of the report in that I have not seen one, personally, myself. The staff handles
