transportation systems for the future, and the high-speed ground transportation project.

But whatever the logic of the plan in terms of the day-to-day administration, it would be a mistake to consider it only in these terms. Much of its significance must be measured against a broader framework of where we are and where we are going in dealing with what is, by all where we are and where we are going and complex of urban problems.

In the first place, we think the plan represents an important step in our thinking about urban transportation. In the past, there has been a common tendency either to deplore the deficiencies of urban transportation systems from the standpoint of transportation objectives, or to deplore the deficiencies of these systems from the standpoint of their deplore the deficiencies of these systems from the standpoint of their deplore the deficiencies of urban development objectives. The plan in effect, or lack of effect, on urban development objectives. The plan in a formal, tangible sense recognizes a hard truth which has become a formal, tangible sense recognizes a hard truth we cannot simply subincreasingly clear in recent years. This is that we cannot simply subincreasingly clear in recent years. This is that we cannot simply subincreasingly clear in recent years. We must deal simultaneously with both, and we must organize our resources and skills for ously with both, and we must organize our resources and skills for dealing more effectively with both.

A second point follows from this first. For as we concentrate our skills and resources upon different aspects of the urban transportation problem, and develop our respective capabilities, we must be aiming problem, and develop our respective capabilities, we must be aiming at something beyond doing a little more efficiently or on a larger scale at something beyond doing a little more efficiently or on a larger scale what we have been doing before. We must be aiming at major improvements in our techniques and methods for doing things, and for tying ments in our techniques and methods for doing things, the results of our work together.

For example, our objective in planning should not be simply to assure that there is planning, or that transportation planning is carried on as a part of comprehensive urban planning. The real need is make planning more effective, better informed, and more responsive at the right times to the right—even if hard—questions. This sive at the right times to the right—even if hard—questions. This means, among other things, that those who plan must be alert to all the technical financial and political problems that are apt to be involved in implementing plans. It means, too, that those engaged in volved in implementing plans. It means, too, that those engaged in long-range planning must be alert to the technological possibilities that long-range planning and that will be available in the future.

So far as the Department of Transportation and the Department of Housing and Urban Development are concerned, success in accomplishing this kind of major improvement requires more than simple agreements on matters of administrative routine. It requires a high degree ments on matters of administrative routine. It requires a high degree ments on matters of administrative routine. We feel that, during the past year the field of urban transportation. We feel that, during the past year understanding. It is reflected in the statements of departmental reunderstanding. It is reflected in the President's massage transmitting the sponsibilities contained in the President's massage transmitting the Housing and Cities, and in the joint report of the two Departments on Housing and Cities, and in the joint report of the plan. We expect that their studies and deliberations leading up to the plan. We expect that their studies are now developing and in other aspects of their relationships in the future.

It must be remembered, however, that success in this broader sense is not a matter simply for the Department of Transportation and the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Nor is it simply—
