

in the basic study of economics. They were circularizing the whole country, apparently, trying to find that kind of talent.

Mr. QUIE. Do any States have programs of this nature, either fellowship or assisting the training centers?

Mr. SIMPSON. I think there are one or two State legislatures that do provide funds to their own State universities for the development of curricula in the field of public service but they are much too small for the need.

Mr. QUIE. Could you find out what they are doing, the amount of program expenditures and all?

Mr. SIMPSON. I will be glad to do that.

(The information requested follows:)

The most current, comprehensive information on State support for public service education dates from 1961. Most State universities and a number of private universities (e.g., Harvard, Princeton, Syracuse, Pittsburgh, Southern California) do offer some degree of financial assistance to able but needy graduate students who are seeking to prepare themselves for careers in the public service. However, the U.S. Office of Education is unaware of any earmarked State support for institutional or curriculum development in the field.

Aside from these programs operated by and through the universities, the State of New York conducts what is probably the only program operated directly by a State government. This is the Herbert H. Lehman Graduate Fellowship program conducted by the Regents Examination and Scholarship Center, State Education Department, Albany, New York, which awards some 90 fellowships annually. A description of this program will be found in Fellowships in the Arts and Sciences, Tenth Edition, 1967-68, American Council on Education, p. 35.

A copy of the 1961 Office of Education survey, Graduate Study in Public Administration is attached.

Mr. QUIE. Just in round numbers, it seems to me, that of the total money expended in domestic programs the Federal Government comes up with about two-fifths and the local and State governments about three-fifths. So they must have the financial wherewithal to do this. They can't be as close to being broke as we are.

How about private foundations? Are there many private foundations that do work in this way?

Mr. SIMPSON. There are a few but not really very much that are doing work in the field of public affairs training, public administration training.

Mr. QUIE. I was thinking of the Bush Foundation in Minnesota as one which has funded that sort of thing. Do you have information on who the private foundations are?

Mr. HURTT. The Eagleton Foundation did a lot of that through Rutgers University. The Ford Foundation for a number of years financed the National Center for Education and Politics.

I think we should make a listing of the foundations.

Mr. QUIE. You could make a listing and include some explanation of what they are doing. When you laid out this program I hope you benefited from the experience of private programs and State programs rather than just walking on the Mall and coming up with another idea.

The Foundation Directory (third edition, 1967) published by the Russell Sage Foundation, lists only three foundations active in the field of public administration, six in the field of citizenship, and ten in the field of government. The number of foundations listed as active in the following closely related fields are: Civic
