

understanding some separate comments which we would like to make at this time.

The witnesses for the authority have testified that a jury is not capable of handling value judgments. This may be true, but juries are also used in life and death considerations, and we think, then, that the argument which the authority uses to keep the jury out of these considerations could equally apply to all of the considerations where a jury is used; for instance, the question of insanity being brought up.

I think it is every bit a touchy situation to decide insanity, or murder, other capital cases, as it is to decide land values.

The association stands ready to provide this committee with any further information they would like to have on the association itself, and we advise the committee also that we will be continuing our investigation and we will submit to the committee a final report when it is ready.
