

The findings and recommendations reflected in this report were based, in large measure, upon the analysis of the data presented to the delegates heretofore described. It is recognized by all concerned that brief exposure to so complex a problem does not necessarily make for expertise. Furthermore, it is recognized that many organizations, public as well as private, have made long and noteworthy contributions to this field. It is not the aim of this Steering Committee to pretend to a knowledge it does not possess. The Committee has tried to bring its own business orientation to bear upon the problem, as it was asked to do by the Governor. If this report has helped increase understanding of some of the problems faced by our society in attempting to meet the public assistance problem, then it considers its mission reasonably accomplished.
